In our archaeological literature the generic term discoidal or bicave is applied indiscriminately to all round, non-spherical objects of stone, shell, bone or hematite, and sometimes of pottery manufacture. Those shown in center of picture are composed of granite and quartzite, are convex and concave and beveled on sides, which are art relics of the Stone Age. When asked to what use these bicave stones were applied, the general answer is for playing games. We ask, How is this fact known? We answer, it is not known, but merely surmised; merely inferred from the accounts of early writers who saw the Aborigines gambling with round stones, called chungke. Judging the prehistoric Americans by their present day descendants, we may well rest assured that they were not so fond of labor as to carve from the hardest rocks and beautifully finish the discoidal stones, and grind out the hollows on each side with such care and symmetry, without some well-defined purpose. No Indian would be guilty of such arduous work to make these cavities and finely polish it; rather let us suppose they were used and worn at ceremonial stunts. Prof. Moorehead, of Andover, Mass., is the best authority we know on prehistoric relics. He says: Ancient man in America was not possessed with iron and steel, nor of other hard...
