The pupil dilates round with atropine. The antero-ciliary arteries, as seen on the exterior of the globe, are much distended. Tension normal. Circulus arteriosus minor perhaps a little above average size in places. A large rounded darkly pigmented tumour projects from the inner surface of the ciliary body into the cavity of the vitreous. It is made principally of dark brown spherical pigment masses of enormous size (0.22 mm., after the hardening of the preparation in Midler's fluid and alcohol), which are in some places aggregated by themselves loosely into groups, whereas in others they have intermixed with them, some smaller cells (0.1 mm.) with distinct small nuclei. There are also sometimes small lighter coloured pigment cells, and a few nuclei which appear to be free. There is no stroma other than that formed by the few blood-vessels, and...
