Not illustrated. 1839 Excerpt: . . . i. a intensity varies greatly in the different boilers. We have seen that on the grate of the locomotive 6. 835 times more heat is generated in equal periods than on the Cornish grate; but the grate of the locomotive has only 7 feet area, whilst that of the Cornish has 23. 66 feet; and we know that nearly 7 times as much fuel cannot be burned in equal times off a grate less by two thirds than another grate, without the accelerated combustion being accompanied by a very considerable elevation of temperature in the products of combustion. The intensity of that combustion must, therefore, be found before its intensity of action on the surfaces exposed to it, can be ascertained. Proposition 9. The areas of the grates are to one another as, follows; the Locomotive is to the Cornish as 7 to 23. 66, or...
